

How You Can Avoid Stress

Get Support:

Support in your life from family, friends, and your community has a big impact on how you experience stress. Having support in your life can help you stay healthy:

Common Sources of Support:

- Family and friends
- Coworkers, or people you know through hobbies or other interests
- A professional counselor
- People you know from church, or a member of the clergy
- Employee assistance programs at work, or stress management classes
- Support groups. These can be very helpful if your stress is caused by a special situation

Look at your lifestyle

The choices you make about the way you live affect your stress level. Your lifestyle may not cause stress on its own, but it can prevent your body from recovering from it. Try to:

- Find a balance between personal, work, and family needs. This isn't easy. Start by looking at how you spend your time. Maybe there are things that you don't need to do at all.
- Have a sense of purpose in life. Many people find meaning through connections with family, friends, jobs, or volunteer work.
- Get enough sleep. Your body recovers from the stresses of the day while you are sleeping.
- Adopt healthy habits. Eat a healthy diet, limit how much alcohol you drink, and don't smoke. Staying healthy is your best defense against stress.
- Exercise. Even moderate exercise, such as taking a daily walk, can reduce stress.

Manage your time

Time management is a way to find the time for more of the things you want and need to do. It helps you decide which things are urgent and which can wait. Managing your time can make your life easier, less stressful, and more meaningful.

Change your thinking

Negative thinking can trigger your body's stress response, just as a real threat does. Dealing with these negative thoughts and the way you see things can help reduce stress. You can learn these techniques on your own, or you can get help from a counselor.

Here are some techniques:

Positive thinking helps you cope with a problem by changing the way you think. How you think affects how you feel.

Problem solving helps you identify all aspects of a stressful event, find things you may be able to change, and deal with things you can't change.

Assertive communication helps you express how you feel in a thoughtful, tactful way. Not being able to talk about your needs and concerns creates stress and can make negative feelings worse.
